

Human Geography

Allison Kantack

Patches of red broke out on her arm in jagged, craggy shapes like continents —
raw, scorched land
bordered
by a black, permanent marker to see if it would spread.

An allergic reaction to morphine, they think.

Yes, it hurts to see her like that.
But she is our atlas;
people look at maps when they feel lost.